Producing and Applying Arbuscular Mycorrhizal Inoculum . To one degree or another, most plants in their natural habitats function under the influence of a special group of soil fungi known as arbuscular mycorrhizal fungi (AM fungi or AMF). The existence of these fungi has been recognized for more than

The role of mycorrhizal fungi in mobilizing soil nutrients, in particular nitrogen. More than 80% of all higher plants are colonized by arbuscular mycorrhizal fungi (AMF), particularly under diverse stress conditions, such as mineral deficiency, drought, pollution by salt or heavy metals, and others.

Most ectomycorrhizal fungi belong to several genera within the class basidiomycetes, while some belong to the zygosporic zygomycetes and ascomycetes.

Arbuscular Mycorrhizal Fungi. VAM fungi belong to the Glomeromycota. They are primitive fungi at the base of the tree for higher fungi (basidiomycetes). They associated with first land plants and appear to have evolved very slowly since then. They have no known sexual state.

Mycorrhizal Associations: Arbuscular Mycorrhizas

Key facts. Arbuscular mycorrhizal fungi (AMF) are soil organisms that form symbiotic associations with most vascular plants. Exceptions include spinach, sugar beets, lupins, and brassicas (e.g., radish, canola, cauliflower, cabbage, and turnip).

The Value of Arbuscular Mycorrhizal Fungi for Field Crops

Arbuscular mycorrhizal fungi are ubiquitous in field soils, as are mycophagous animals such as Collembola. It has been suggested that these animals reduce the functioning of the mycorrhiza and are thus detrimental to plant growth.

Abstract. Arbuscular mycorrhizal fungi are known as obligate symbionts. Many attempts have been made, to establish them in axenic culture(s) on a variety of media, but none have so far been a proven success. A few reports claim the growth of AMF (arbuscular mycorrhizal fungi) on defined media, but none of these withstand critical evaluation.

Methods for culturing and isolating arbuscular mycorrhizal

Arbuscular Mycorrhizal Fungi (AMF) constitute a group of root obligate biotrophs that exchange mutual benefits with about 80% of plants. They are considered natural biofertilizers, since they provide the host with water, nutrients, and pathogen protection, in exchange for photosynthetic products.
